Message No. 75 – SHAMA

After the Shock of a Tragic Mass Casualty Event, the Nation Must Regain Clarity and Prepare Responsibly for the Next Phase

Time is short — we must act wisely.

Great, grieving, and justice-seeking People of Iran,

After every major crisis, societies require time to regain balance. The deeper the trauma, the longer recovery usually takes. Yet crises are also defined by limited time for decision-making.

Iran now stands at a decisive historical moment. The country faces rapid developments that demand clarity, unity, and responsibility.

1. The recent tragic events have deeply affected national morale. Emotional shock must not turn into paralysis.
2. Structural causes that led to unrest remain unresolved. Ignoring them risks further instability.
3. Escalation — whether internal or external — would only increase human cost and national vulnerability.
4. The nation must avoid emotional reactions that could unintentionally deepen instability.
5. Sustainable national progress requires organization, social cohesion, and rational strategy.
6. History shows that external intervention has rarely served long-term national stability in the region.
7. The primary responsibility for Iran's future lies with its people.
8. In moments of crisis, the greatest danger is fragmentation, despair, and lack of coordinated national vision.
9. The path forward must prioritize national unity, disciplined civic engagement, and peaceful, structured action.
10. The coming period requires maturity, solidarity, and strategic patience.

Time is short — wisdom must prevail.

With respect to the Great People of Iran.
